

USAID
FROM THE AMERICAN PEOPLE

GUATEMALA

FIRST PERSON

Gang Member Gets Second Chance

Youth embrace alternatives to violence and “dirty money”

Omar and another former gang member work in a machine shop in Guatemala City. USAID has helped them learn new skills that make them attractive to employers.

“When I came here, I couldn’t read and write. Now, I’m even learning computer skills. The repair shop helps me learn more,” said Omar, a former gang member participating in a USAID-sponsored gang rehabilitation program.

For many years, Omar was known as “The Devil.” Like many youth in his neighborhood, he was the member of a gang. More lucky than some of his childhood friends who are now dead, Omar managed to leave the gang and join a USAID-sponsored rehabilitation program.

Omar’s story is not unusual. The challenges facing young women and men in Guatemalan society are staggering: only two out of every ten youth attend high school. Half of all Guatemalan women have a child before the age of 19. By the time they reach 30, many have given birth to seven or more children. Job training and steady jobs are hard to come by. Confronted by more obstacles than opportunities, many urban and rural youth are driven to seek identity and acceptance on the streets, where they fall victim to exploitative labor practices, drug trafficking and abuse, gang culture, and violence. It is estimated that over 150,000 young people in Guatemala are in gangs.

Two years ago, USAID launched an initiative with Guatemala’s government and private businesses to give vulnerable and at-risk youth life skills and constructive alternatives to help prevent them from accepting questionable jobs and “dirty money.” The initiative also works with former gang members to help them return to an honest and violence-free life through job training and community programs.

The program promotes initiatives such as cultural festivals, mural painting contests, theater, and sports competitions. Since September 2004, over 1,200 at-risk and vulnerable youth have received life and work skills training and accelerated primary education, and approximately 100 youth have found jobs.

Omar has now finished the fourth grade and one day hopes to attend college. Thanks to his determination and USAID, he will undoubtedly be an example for many other former gang members. Through this USAID-led initiative, vulnerable and at-risk youth have shown they will steer away from a life of crime if they get a fair chance at becoming productive citizens and leading successful lives.

Telling Our Story
U.S. Agency for International Development
Washington, DC 20523-1000
<http://stories.usaid.gov>